WILL MEASURE SPEED OF LIGHT

Pipeline One Mile in Length Also Tests Einstein Theory

CHICAGO, Sept. 10.—Two shafts of light, racing through a steel tube, one mile in length, and a foot in diameter, is the latest test devised for the Einstein theory of relativity by Professor Albert A. Michelson, noted physicist of the University of Chicago, who has just returned from California, where he conducted extensive experiments at Mount Wilson observatory.

BEAMS TIMED

At each of the four corners of a square, he said, measuring a quarter of a mile on each side, a mirror was placed, from one corner a beam of light was dispatched around one way—in the direction of the rotation of the earth. Simultaneously another beam was dispatched around the other way—opposite to the direction of the earth's rotation. By use of a delicate instrument, Professor Michelson was able to identify the beams upon their return. If they returned at exactly the same instant, the Einstein theory would have been repudiated. If they returned simultaneously, he said, it would have established that the rotation of the earth exercises no influence over the beam of light.
